To assess the safety of performing coronary angiography in the presence of an apparently normal mitral valve, transesophageal echocardiography was performed in 167 consecutive patients undergoing coronary angiography for evaluation of ischemic cardiopathy or chest pain. Patients with apparent mitral disease (mitral stenosis, mitral insufficiency) were excluded from the study. Transesophageal echocardiographic evaluation was performed after coronary angiography. In 61% of patients, mitral abnormalities were discovered, many of them by transesophageal echocardiography; the mechanism of mitral disease, however, was determined only in 29% of patients. In the remaining patients mitral valve disease was considered benign. The presence of myocardial ischemia or abnormal wall motion on transesophageal echocardiography did not change coronary angiographic findings. It is concluded that coronary angiography can be safely performed in the presence of an apparently normal mitral valve, though the appropriate management and the precise anatomical location of coronary lesions remain to be defined.Laser speckle imaging: effects of inhomogeneities in scattering media on the formation of the speckle pattern.
