Heterogeneous Systems The traffic triangle meets the water cycle in The Netherlands Information about the theme Industry Sector: Water - Energy Water Cycle Fluvial Processes Geospatial Metrics Ecological The theme of 'Heterogeneous Systems' aims to provide an overview of the hydrology in the Netherlands. While the more traditional main theme - the hydrologic cycle - investigates the interactions between the physical, chemical, biological, and psychological processes within the realm of the water cycle, 'Heterogeneous Systems' focuses on the origin and interactions of biometrics. In this line of reasoning, this theme refers to the role of the environment. Environmental variables can, and will, affect the function of ecosystems, which will in turn affect the cycling of water in that area (i.e. water cycle). The heterogeneity of the system is important to understand, especially since urbanisation will of course transform the hydrology. In addition to the altered hydrology, urbanisation appears to have brought about changes in the surrounding ecosystems. One example is the fragmentation of habitats. Due to urbanisation, plants and animals are forced to interact. However, if insects and reptiles lack habitats, like woodlands or forests, this can only be compensated by opening new habitats - preferably in areas with a high potential for niche complementarity. Topic Time horizon 2016 (start), 2018, 2019 (end) Context Heterogeneous Systems may be investigated in three sub-topics: Biometric Interactions, i.e. the interactions between the human and the environment in urban areas. Local government authorities are improving the quality of living conditions for citizens. Many constituents of the urban ecosystem now have a voice. The public (i.e. companies) can apply for a permit (e.g. for access to a neighborhood or private road). The public authorities pay attention to resident's needs. As a rule, environmental variables will influence the character of the urban biotic environment. Environmental variables may affect the circulation, drainage, water pressure, surface water temperature, flooding, solid surface water layer, and so on. Local and regional environmental variables influence the biotic environment. In this line of reasoning, we divide the discussion of biometric interactions into two parts: 1) floristic and land use legislation
