The attack has already started to slow down in intensity. A New York Times article report by John Markoff explained that attackers started asking for hundreds of thousands of dollars in Bitcoin as ransom for halting the attack. PayPal was the first target of the attack. Its system was reported to be been slow down for more than 20 hours now. The attacker's main motive behind it was to get the attention of authorities to crack down on anonymous online activities. It appears that they have succeeded. The FBI also issued a press release that they were monitoring the attacks and other online criminal activities by people who operated under the anonymous Tor service. While the attack is still ongoing, Anonymous made a post claiming responsibility for the DDoS attack. This post was published under a new Twitter handle called @OpLastResort. Anonymous gave six points as to why it launched DDoS attacks. For some time now, we have been campaigning for the repeal of the anti-anonymous legislation pending in the U.S. Congress, the Domain Name System Security Extensions (DNSSEC). We also see this as an opportunity to bring these issues to the public to further awareness. The attack was timed to coincide with the vote to prohibit such legislation and the mass media talking about it. We have also been busy with other projects to bring awareness. We have been working on numerous applications that require the user to log in anonymously. Our intention was to make it uncomfortable for corporate users to log in anonymously, therefore out of respect for them, we have been doing this in the more public areas of our projects. Despite this, we find it unacceptable that Firefox users can't be anonymous on our own site. For this reason, we will continue to do this until the browser is fixed. We have also been busy working on new projects. We have been seeing the need for new tools and processes to bypass the anti-anonymous legislative proposals. We have been designing such projects and evaluating different options. Last summer, the group Anonymous has declared war on the Stop Online Piracy Act (SOPA) and the Protect IP Act (PIPA). We have been busy with the preparation of those projects

Amateur Radio Emergency Services Emergency communications are often called upon in the aftermath of catastrophic events such as earthquakes, hurricanes and tsunamis. The people in these affected areas have to rely on the traditional communication means, such as cell phones, radios, and television for news and information. Amateur Radio Emergency Services (ARES) are one of the most important services that Amateur Radio offers to communities in times of disaster. ARES teams are trained and prepared to coordinate radio communications among first responders in the critical moments after an emergency has started to occur. They are capable of communicating with other responders and to public safety officials, and of receiving critical information in the aftermath of disaster, which will enable them to effectively plan and lead rescue efforts. The idea of ARES existed long before the internet but internet enabled communications technologies have expanded the scope and usefulness of the service. Amateur Radio Emergency Services exists both for emergency communications and for humanitarian efforts. W1CPSAR is a member of the ARES organization, EASC (Emergency Amateur Service Canada) and has been involved in providing Amateur Radio Emergency Communications since early 2008. W1CPSAR provides the following: A comms equipment A comms manual Event management and planning documents Charity information A training centre A listening room A conference hall A picnic area and comfortable area for visitors Depending on the emergency, ARES teams provide a variety of services including: Service activation Onsite emergency communications Information about the event and impact of the event to the community Radio Traffic Control Administrative and logistical support Emergency Support Disclaimer: The contents of this website are for informational purposes only and is not intended to be legal advice. A: Development mode is used to test out the latest, and updated versions of your application, while production mode is for application actually going live. You might want to read the application engine and advanced scenarios documentation for more information on what use each mode is for. Edit: The more up-to-date documentation for the newer version is here. # # DO NOT ALTER OR REMOVE COPYRIGHT NOTICES OR THIS HEADER. # # Copyright (c) 2010 Oracle and/or its affiliates.
