Weather forecasting is crucial to safe travel in many parts of the world and despite the many advances in technology today, very little progress has been made in this area. A few notable exceptions are the ionosphere, atmospheric radiosondes and radar. Weather satellites have now flown since the 1970s and have even tracked storms and weather phenomena while in orbit. But, what about the present and future? What about the satellites that are already in orbit? Are there any plans for other weather satellites for commercial use? We'll be looking at these issues and more. This conference will explore the challenges that will be faced in the coming year for the International Space Station. While research on the space station has been ongoing since the early 1990s and its life beyond 2015 is currently unknown, the coming year will not only be a critical point for the life of the station, but also one in which the final design decisions will be made and the ground operations will be planned to move forward when those decisions have been made. After extensive years of planning, the pressurized modules and the power and propulsion subsystems will be built and tested, and then the Soyuz and Progress vehicles will start ferrying crews to the station, the first in early July 2017. Getting the Russian side of things going will be the final technical milestone needed to begin assembling the station. By August 2018, when the crew of Expedition 59 arrives, the station will have been occupied for more than fifteen months, a milestone that has never been reached before. Then, for the first time, the station will have a permanent resident for the first time, completing the vision of its designers. After this, work will be planned to build the new era of ISS science that began in 2012. These science goals, such as the James Webb Space Telescope and upcoming investigations in cosmic ray physics, are what will make the station a true technological platform for the future of space exploration, making the space station a true laboratory for understanding the Universe and how it works. In the middle of the Atlantic Ocean, the International Space Station orbits the Earth more than 400 km away, almost exactly above the Equator. As a result of this distance, the ISS sees a completely different view of the Earth, especially during
